Time magazine has honored a Taiwanese vegetable vendor Chen Shu-chu as one of the 100 most influential people of 2010. Chen was also selected by Forbes magazine as one of the 48 heroes of philanthropy from Asia. Out of her modest income, she has donated NT$10 million to charity over the years, including a children's fund, construction of a library at a school, and construction of the local orphanage, where she also gives financial support to three children.

Everyday around 3 a.m., Chen shows up at the wholesale market to pick fresh produce. At 4 a.m., her stall opens for business, and customers are already waiting. She came from a poor family and was forced to drop out of school at the age of 13 to support her six brothers and sisters following the death of her mother. Her mother died in labor and her brother died of illness because her family could not afford medical care. She took over her mother's vegetable stand and has been selling vegetables at Central Market in Taitung since 1963.

She makes a small profit of five to ten NT dollars on each sale. The nickels and dimes she earns are the basis for her charitable giving. Many poor students and families whom she has never met have had their lives changed by her generosity. Chen Shu-chu is merely a common grocery vendor. She is not famous. The 61-year-old once told a newspaper that money is not useful unless it is given to those in need. Her story encourages many people that even though they may not be rich, their small donations may come as a great help to some less fortunate people.

A fingerprint is an impression of the ridges, or raised portions, of our fingers. When we touch certain surfaces, material from our fingers is left behind and fingerprints remain. The police can use such fingerprints to identify the people who left them. This is because no two people—not even identical twins—have the same fingerprints.

Scientists who analyze fingerprints have classified them into three types: latent, patent, and plastic. Latent prints may show only a small portion of the finger and may be smudged or distorted, depending on how they were made. This kind of print is not reliable for the police to establish a person's identity. Patent prints are ridge impressions which are easily seen by human eyes. Since these prints are already visible, they are generally photographed. A plastic print is a ridge impression that has been pressed into a material that retains the shape of the ridges. Examples of these prints are commonly found in melted candle wax and grease on car parts. These prints are also easy to see, but they may be accompanied by latent prints of other people, so investigators have to examine them carefully.

Although there are hundreds of reported techniques for fingerprint detection, only about twenty are really effective and currently being used. Some involve using a chemical that reacts with the amino acids in the print; other methods depend on a powder sticking to oily or watery print deposits. As technology improves, so does fingerprint detection. This is bad news for criminals who think they can simply wipe away their fingerprints and not be identified by the police.

- (B) The fingerprints can be photographed.

- (D) 20

(28) Which of the following statements is NOT TRUE?

- (A) The police should depend on latent prints to establish one's identity.
- (B) The identical twins don't have the identical fingerprints.
- (C) Some fingerprints can be seen without special instruments.
- (D) Using a powder sticking to oily or watery print deposits is an effective method for fingerprint detection.

(29) How are patent prints examined?

- (A) By melting them
- (B) By smudging them
- (C) By pasting them
- (D) By photographing them

- (A) Currently over one hundred techniques for fingerprint detection are used by the police.
