Father was a stout man, so crossing over there would be no mean task. At first I wanted to go myself, but he wouldn't allow it, so all I could do was let him go. I watched him hobble over to the tracks in his black cloth cap, black cloth gown, and dark blue outer jacket, and slowly ease himself down without too much trouble. But when he had crossed the tracks and was trying to climb up to the other platform, that was no easy matter. He grabbed hold of it with two hands, then hoisted up both of his legs, his stout body listing to the left and showing the great strain he was exerting. It was then that I noticed the silhouette of his back, and tears promptly coursed down my cheeks.
